The Birthday Present

Bert could hardly sleep. He tossed and turned in his bed so much that there was a danger of him falling out and landing on the floor on more than one occasion! He thought it never would be morning. At last, when it seemed as though he had laid awake for hours, he fell asleep, and lay quietly upon his pillow until the sun shone through his open window.

And the reason for Bert's excitement? Go down the ladder-like stairs, out through the little kitchen, and into the shed at the back of the house; there you shall find out the cause of all Bert's excitement. For there, in the corner, in part of an old basket, sits Mrs. Hen, rather excited herself this morning.

Bert has one little sister; golden-haired, blue-eyed Maggie, whom he loves very dearly. "What can I do for Maggie?" is his one thought. For weeks he saved all his pennies, and ran all sorts of errands for the neighbours, so that he might have money for Maggie's birthday present.

Maggie will be four tomorrow, and Mrs. Hen has been sitting in that basket for three long weeks. How Bert has had to watch to keep Maggie away from the shed, and how carefully he has attended to Mrs. Hen's few wants!

When the sun shone full on Bert's face, he woke up, and with one spring that carried him almost across the room, he got into his clothes and hurried on down to the shed. He was trembling, for fear he would not find things as he wanted them; so much so that he was scarcely able to lift the latch to the shed door. But when once inside, he felt sure he could hear the tiny "Chirp, chirp" of newly hatched chicks. Down on his knees he went and, in spite of Mrs. Hen's pecks at his hands, he felt under her two, three or even four little balls of down.

Running into the house, and waking them all with the happy shout, "Maggie, it is your birthday!", he snatched Maggie from her bed and hurried her down to the shed.

All his self-denial was fully repaid by Maggie's delight, for she at once took one of the little soft chicks up in her hands and kissed and kissed it. Her delight was cut short for a time, though, when her mother came to get Maggie to dress her; for Bert, in his excitement, had carried her off in her night clothes!

The End

What Happened to Roy's Shoes?

"Roy Haydon, how you do wear out your shoes?! Just look at that one!"

Roy looked obediently at the shoes he had just kicked off, preparatory to going to bed, and laughed outright. His mother laughed, too, in spite of her vexation; there was such an air of good fellowship and hearty openness about the shoe - rather too much openness, in fact! Right across the toe was a hole that looked like a wide, open mouth, laughing heartily back at them as if it would like to tell jolly tales. What wonder that Roy laughed as he looked at it; but there was a sober side, too, for it was not the easiest matter in the world for his mum to find money to buy the endless number of new shoes required to keep Roy's feet properly covered.

"What are old shoes good for, Mother?" asked Roy, when he was nicely tucked up in bed.

"Good to throw away," she laughed, as she stooped to kiss him goodnight.

"But they must be good for something," insisted Roy. "Can't anything be made out of old leather?"

"Yes," said his mother, "a good many things. Glue is made from leather, and from horns and hoofs, as well. The gelatine you are so fond of, is made entirely from leather, but I don't think your old shoes would do for that, Roy, so you needn't look so disgusted! So, you see, Roy, your old shoes may not have outlived their usefulness yet!"

Roy went to sleep and dreamed of wonderful things that were done with his shoes; but neither he nor his mother dreamed what really happened to them. They were thrown out into a field behind the house and forgotten; but one day, late in the summer, Roy came upon one of them, and clapped his hands in glee. There was a family of field mice, making themselves very much at home, using the hole in the toe as a front door, and scampering up and down with stores of wheat, which they were laying up for winter use. "Mother," said Roy that night, "you spoke of my shoes being turned into glue, but you never thought that one of them would make a whole house!"
